

Parenting under adversity: birth parents' accounts of inequality and adoption

Lewis, S. J. & Brady, G.

Published PDF deposited in Coventry University's Repository

Original citation & hyperlink:

Lewis, SJ & Brady, G 2018, 'Parenting under adversity: birth parents' accounts of inequality and adoption' Social Sciences, vol. 7, no. 12, 257.

<https://dx.doi.org/10.3390/socsci7120257>

DOI 10.3390/socsci7120257

ISSN 2076-0760

ESSN 2076-0760

Publisher: MDPI

This is an open access article distributed under the Creative Commons Attribution License which permits unrestricted use, distribution, and reproduction in any medium, provided the original work is properly cited (CC BY 4.0).

Copyright © and Moral Rights are retained by the author(s) and/ or other copyright owners. A copy can be downloaded for personal non-commercial research or study, without prior permission or charge. This item cannot be reproduced or quoted extensively from without first obtaining permission in writing from the copyright holder(s). The content must not be changed in any way or sold commercially in any format or medium without the formal permission of the copyright holders.

Article

Parenting under Adversity: Birth Parents' Accounts of Inequality and Adoption

Shirley Lewis and Geraldine Brady *

¹ Centre for Trust, Peace and Social Relations, Coventry University, Coventry CV1 5FB, UK; lewiss13@uni.coventry.ac.uk

² Centre for Innovative Research across the Lifecourse, Coventry University, Coventry CV1 5FB, UK

* Correspondence: g.brady@coventry.ac.uk; Tel.: +44-0755-742-5791

Received: 6 October 2018; Accepted: 28 November 2018; Published: 6 December 2018

Abstract: This paper aims to highlight inequality in current adoption processes and procedures in England and Wales. Whilst inequality has been recognised in adoption research, the role of social structures is often neglected. Inequality within social structures plays a role in the process of the permanent removal of children to be adopted and is worthy of further attention. Birth parent voices can contribute to a wider understanding of adoption, but often remain hidden. Empirical research findings highlight how birth parents may find that their adverse experiences are exacerbated by the adoption process, the emotional impact causing existing problems to increase, and through the impact of the adoption process on birth parent's socio-economic status. Findings also illustrate how birth parents' experiences were influenced by ideals of motherhood and ideas about 'risk' to children. The paper contributes to the growing area of research which illuminates the intersection of poverty, deprivation and child protection services and the wider contemporaneous debate concerning adoption in England and Wales.

Keywords: Adoption; inequality; birth parents; gender; adversity

1. Introduction

Adoption is an emotive issue, which captures the public imagination and draws out a strength of feeling. Often empathy is shown towards children who are neglected, abused and need 'rescuing' from 'bad' parents; the ideal of a warm, safe, stable family to protect a child is highly seductive. Warner (2015) states that the development of child protection and welfare policies takes place within an 'emotional climate'; referring to the role of the media and political leaders concerning child protection she argues that emotions are political and politics are emotional.

Adoption is legislated for under The Adoption and Children Act \(2002\) in England and Wales. Adoption orders give parental responsibility to the adopters, extinguishing parental responsibility held by any other person. All legal ties between child and birth parent are severed, and adopted children are treated in law as if born to the adopters (The Adoption and Children Act 2002, s. 67). Adoption is therefore regarded as the most 'draconian' intervention by the state, only to be granted in cases where it is deemed 'proportional' (Re G \(A child\) 2013, p. 53).

In the year ending 31 March 2017, there were 72,760 children looked after in England, and 4350 children adopted from care in England, a relatively small proportion of the looked after population (Department for Education 2017). The number of children adopted from care has fluctuated over time but has increased significantly since the 1980s and 1990s, when around 2000 children were adopted from care each year (PIU 2000). Attention also needs to be paid to the combined use of adoption and Special Guardianship Orders (SGOs) (Bilson 2017) to understand the growing extent of the permanent removal of children. 3690 children were subject to SGOs in the year ending 31 March 2017, leading to a combined total of 26% of all children who ceased to be looked after (Department for Education 2017). These figures reflect government policy which has aimed to increase the number of adoptions and legislation designed to reduce, delay and simplify the adoption process (The Adoption and Children Act 2002; The Children and Families Act 2014).

How does adoption become the preferred choice of response by policy makers? Adoption has become seen as the answer to social problems, with families increasingly characterised as individually responsible for (social) problems (Kirton 2013). Adoption may be viewed as a form of 'child rescue' from poor families (Featherstone et al. 2014; Gillies et al. 2017). Definitions and current frameworks of understanding influence ideas about parental neglect, harm, and concepts of 'risk'. Current discourse on neglect focuses on individual pathology and ignores the complex interrelation between poverty and neglect (Gupta 2017). Bilson (2017) argues that 'children's services is increasingly investigative' and increasingly separates children from parents; the increased use of adoption is part of 'net widening' and has not resulted in a reduction in the looked after children population. Whilst a 'child rescue' narrative fits with the current aim to increase the number of adoptions, it is arguably enhanced by the historical legacy of children from poor families being adopted by middle class adopters in the 1950s (Kirton 2013; Dey 2005), and the role which adoption plays in regulating wider constructions of the 'family' and its role within the state (Lewis 2004; Logan 2013).

Alongside the focus on neglect as an individual pathology are ideas about the risks which parents can pose to their children through -exposure to domestic violence, mental ill health, and/or substance misuse. The concept of the 'toxic trio' has been highly influential (Cleaver et al. 1999; Brandon et al. 2012) in professional circles, particularly in services which have a remit for the protection and support of children. Parents have been cast as a 'risk' to their children. The individualised focus on risk factors serves to pathologise parental behaviour without acknowledging the impact of underlying structural factors. Featherstone et al. (2017) argue that 'the extent to which this underclass discourse has entered into the accounts from social workers about the families and communities with which they work [. . .] suggest that the profession itself has absorbed and now utilises wider social and political discourses about the failing poor and the toxicity of needs' (Featherstone et al. 2017, p. 23).

Pressure on child welfare services has undoubtedly increased under austerity—the difficult economic conditions created by UK government measures in order to reduced public spending. Expenditure on family support services has been reduced, impacting on delivery of appropriate services (Webb and Bywaters 2018). At a time when child social care services have overspent their budgets by £816 m in the past year, questions should be raised about the level of support available to birth parents prior to their children being removed (Savage 2018).

The following section details the context in which adoption in England and Wales is taking place, before moving on to discuss the research study (REF FIRST AUTHOR) from which examples are drawn. The findings focus on birth parents' experiences of adoption and do not consider adoption from a child's perspective. Research has highlighted the benefits of adoption for children (Quinton and Selwyn 2009; Thomas 2013). As part of the adoption triangle, however, birth parent voices can add to a wider understanding of adoption, in addition to being worthy of exploration in their own right.

For birth parents, the process of adoption can be experienced as oppressive; parents can be left feeling vulnerable and powerless. This may be heightened by inequalities of class and gender (Clapton and Clifton 2016; Neal and Lopez 2016) and ethnicity (Gupta and Lloyd-Jones 2016). Class inequality has always existed, the resources available to most birth parents in comparison to the overwhelmingly middle class adoptive parents differ vastly. Class may be closely tied with gender; there is a gendered nature to parenting, with differences between discourses around motherhood and fatherhood, (Alldred 1996; Dominelli 2009; Phoenix and Woollett 1991). Notions of motherhood are strongly associated with notions of morality and femininity, whilst it is acceptable for fathers to have greater emotional and physical distances from their children (Dominelli 2009; Gillies 2006). Within the 'hierarchy of motherhood' (DiLapi 1989) motherhood is an expected identity but only in the 'right' social, economic and sexual circumstances (Letherby 1994). The ideology of intensive motherhood deems that motherhood is child-centred, self-sacrificing, involving constant emotion work (Hays 1996). Moreover, mothers who undertake mothering practices in a way that society perceives as incorrect or undesirable are devalued (Gillies 2006). The practices or behaviour of less advantaged parents can become subject to professional judgement or labelled as deviant from an expected norm.

The link between adoption and policy is also complicated by social work values and practices, and the legal system. Adoption may only be considered for children 'where nothing else will do' and court judgements stating this have had an impact on adoption figures, with the number of adoptions declining since they peaked in 2015 (Re B-S 2013, p. 197). Nonetheless the prominence given to adoption by policy makers, alongside notions of idealised motherhood discussed above, may lead to social workers overlooking poverty as a factor within adoption:

'With non-consensual adoption becoming a favoured social work intervention by policy makers the settlement between the family and the state becomes ever more complex. This is contested territory [. . .], however any analysis of social work with families must acknowledge the influence on practice of the development of political preference for permanent care outside the family for some children.' (Morris et al. 2015).

Given this broad context, it is therefore a matter of debate as to whether adoption is a last resort or a first response, within a climate of austerity and a crisis of funding within children's social care, juxtaposed with the judicial view that adoption should only be used as a last resort (Re B-S 2013). Yet where support services are increasingly scarce and poverty is not taken into account in decision-making, the question is raised as to whether it really is possible for adoption to be a last resort?

Impact on Birth Parents of Adoption

The impact of adoption on birth parents is established in literature, including feelings of grief, loss and shame (Charlton et al. 1998; Memarnia et al. 2015; Neil et al. 2010; Smeeton and Boxall 2011; Morriss 2018). Despite this, there is evidence that birth parents voices continue to be dismissed (Garrett 2002; Kirton 2013). Research into birth parent's experiences of adoption acknowledges that birth parents are affected by inequality (Charlton et al. 1998; Hill et al. 1992; Luckock and Broadhurst 2013; Neil 2006). However, an emphasis on individual parenting factors within adoption literature means that structural factors are often disregarded. This is consistent with a neoliberal emphasis on the individual as responsible for social problems (Kirton 2013; Parton 2011). Wider research into the looked after children population suggests that children in the most deprived centile are 11 times more likely to be looked after than children in the least deprived centile (Bywaters et al. 2017). Other researchers have also highlighted some of the structural inequalities apparent within adoption. Roberts et al. (2017) found that a quarter of birth mothers and a fifth of birth fathers were likely to have been in care themselves as children (Roberts et al. 2017). A review of the ethics of adoption highlighted how adoption should be considered within the wider social contexts of poverty and inequality (Featherstone et al. 2018).

Poverty, however, is often dismissed by social workers or regarded as too big to tackle; it is also so much a part of social work places of practice that it can become a 'normative backdrop, something unremarkable and unremarked upon' (Morris et al. 2018, p. 367). In recent research which highlights the relationship between children's social work interventions and the influence of material circumstances it was argued that poverty has become invisible to practitioners (Featherstone et al. 2017). Whilst poverty, unemployment, poor housing, domestic abuse, substance misuse and mental health difficulties were regarded as connected issues, 'social workers rarely considered the root causes of family troubles and the role socio-economic hardships played in these' (Morris et al. 2018). It was noted that heavy caseloads, tight timescales and budget cuts 'undermined social workers' attempts to engage with the roots of family troubles'. Importantly, child protection conference reports were 'missing attention to the context of family suffering' (p. 12). The outcome of this was that references made to 'parenting capacity' were often decontextualized from parents' available resources.

This therefore raises questions about the experiences of birth mothers and birth fathers who have lost a child to adoption, and how adoption may impact upon their own sense of identity, self-worth and sense of place in the world. What follows is a further contribution to the wider contemporaneous debate that is taking place regarding inequality within adoption.

2. Materials and Methods

The data is drawn from a wider empirical study by the first author, undertaken as a PhD research project. The research focused on birth parents' experiences of adoption, including their understanding of consent within adoption. This paper focuses on a key finding from the research- birth parents' experiences of adversity within the adoption process.

The study adopted a life history approach to data gathering, which helped to ensure that birth parents' voices were kept central and allowed for exploration of the interaction between an individual's story and their historical, temporal and social context, thus turning the life story into a life history (Giele and Elder 1998; Goodson and Sikes 2001; Tierney 2000). Life history methods explore how a life has been socially constructed, and may also be viewed themselves as social constructions, located within historical circumstances (Goodson and Sikes 2001). A life history approach can be a suitable method to use with groups whose voices have traditionally been silenced (Letherby 2003).

Ethical considerations were reviewed throughout the research process, due to the vulnerability of participants and the sensitive nature of the topic. Ethical approval was obtained from Coventry University and participating agencies, and informed consent was obtained from all participants. Consideration was given to confidentiality and anonymity given the depth of information shared. Participants were reminded, at regular intervals, of their ability to withdraw from the research and several prospective participants chose to withdraw. Participants were signposted to support or received support from gatekeepers where required. The content of the interviews and writing up of the results also raised ethical challenges, as a balance needed to be struck between portraying significant information without sensationalising birth parents' experiences (Plummer 2001).

Positionality can be used to highlight the perspective of the researcher, despite criticisms that it may overlook or over-emphasise different aspects (Frost and Holt 2014; Frost and Rodriguez 2015). The researcher's interest in the topic came from her experience as a social worker, and participants were made aware of this. Whilst this may have led to some birth parents choosing not to participate, it was necessary, to facilitate informed consent.

Parent participants were predominantly accessed through voluntary agencies in England and Wales, including adoption agencies and family support agencies, with one participant being accessed through snowball sampling. Unstructured life history interviews were undertaken with 12 birth mothers and two birth fathers, one birth mother identified as British Asian and the remaining participants as White British. Parents (although not all) used creative techniques including the creation of a timeline, or the use of photographs for elicitation. Timelines can scaffold the history, enhance participant reflexivity and identify important turning points and events from the participant's perspective (Bagnoli 2009; Clandenin and Connelly 1998). Photographs were participant led and served as a memory trigger (Clandenin and Connelly 1998), two participants shared life story books that they had previously created. The creative methods were regarded as tools, they were not used with every participant as the research was collaborative and some participants chose not to use the creative methods.

Interviews were recorded, transcribed verbatim and the data was analysed thematically, which allowed for both within and across case analysis by the first author (Braun and Clarke 2013; Riessman 2008). The transcripts were first read as a whole, before using computer-assisted qualitative data analysis software (CAQDAS) to code and organise the data. Initial codes were developed from the data, with broader themes derived from both the data and a conceptual framework developed from the literature around birth parents' experiences of adoption. As this work was undertaken by a single researcher, steps were taken to guard against bias. Negative case analysis was explored, with contradictions and ambiguities within the data being viewed as part of experience within a life history approach (Padgett 2008; Plummer 2001; Tierney 2000). Once analysis had been undertaken and themes developed, tentative findings were also shared with two focus groups of birth parents in order to check findings and enhance credibility of the research.

3. Results

Our focus here, through exploring the theme of parental adversity, is to highlight the ways in which the adoption process reflects and/or exacerbates inequality. The theme of 'parental adversity' is addressed through the sub themes which emerged from the data—(1) parenting under adversity before child(ren) were removed, (2) parenting after removal and (3) parenting after adoption. The theme of 'parental adversity' forms part of the wider context of birth parents' experiences of adoption, and enhances understanding of birth parent views of consent within the adoption process. The data is presented in a linear way, as adversity presented differently for birth parents within each part of the adoption process, and also illustrates the finding that parental adversity was exacerbated through the adoption process.

3.1. Parenting under Adversity: Before Child(ren's) Removal

The research data highlighted the ways in which birth parents struggled prior to their children being removed. Poverty was a factor for many birth parents, their day to day experience of parenting took place against a backdrop of poverty, as Maggie describes:

My children was always fed, um, it was me you know, to feed my children. I mean, at that time I'm um [my daughter] was still on milk as well as food, um but [my son] was on his four meals a day, and boy did he love his food (laughs). Um, er, but it was me at that time, to feed them I was starving some days some days I wouldn't eat for two, three, some weeks I wouldn't even eat for two, three days just so I could make sure my kids was fed and there was electric in. And you know, it, it'd become a real struggle, um, and because I'd moved not only areas and then um got a job, got a part time job, obviously I was only entitled to so much in benefit, which all, which affected my housing benefit. Which at the time I was in a private renting he kicked, he then gave me my notice, um because it'd affected the amount of rent which is how I ended up having to move very quickly. He'd given me seven days to get out, um, and I had to accept and move into this attempt at a council house which, which was squalor at the time. (Maggie)

This extract illustrates how poverty impacted all areas of Maggie's life. Managing poverty impacts on whether Maggie can eat, purchase electricity, afford the rent. Poverty therefore created instability for Maggie and her children. A further example, provided by Lucy, illustrates how messy and complex life in poverty can be:

"But of course when you've got an influx of so many problems you know, you've got the health, you've got my housekeeping, not brilliant (laughs), you've got domestic violence, you've got you know gangs and crime (pause) that is a great number of things to deal with in one context." (Lucy)

Here Lucy illustrates how managing poverty is a burden, and can adversely impact on health and anxiety levels.

Gender also contributed to adversity for birth mothers and practical difficulties, including childcare, could make birth mothers' day to day lived experiences difficult to manage. Mary had a series of difficult circumstances, and was living in privately rented accommodation with her partner and three children when she had to get part time work as her landlord suddenly increased the rent. Despite her partner remaining at home, she viewed childcare as her responsibility and described feeding her baby during her break, “the youngest one I have to keep bottle feeding, I said, so is it ok if I have my break every three hours so I can go and feed her and come straight back?” The discourse of the ‘good’, devoted, self-sacrificing mother holds strong, as Brown, Brady and Letherby have previously argued in their research with teenage mothers ‘a good mother is there for their child and does not relinquish responsibility by ‘dumping’ them on a child minder or nursery or, in some cases, the child’s father’ (Brown et al. 2014, p. 98).

Alongside additional caring responsibilities, birth mothers reported high levels of domestic and sexual violence. Mothers described the complexity of their circumstances and the dilemmas presented when faced with the threat of ‘losing’ their child:

“Rather than social services saying either get out of this relationship or lose your kid, it’s not that easy, because they don’t know they could be in charge of the finances. So if you’ve been in that relationship, say, for 10 years and they’ve had control of that money you don’t know any more, it goes out your memory. It’s like, ‘oh how do I do this now’ . . . you’ve gotta reprogramme yourself, and with them relationships it’s hard.” (Caroline)

Caroline suggests that the combination of poverty and domestic violence add complexity, leading to difficulties in ending the relationship (post adoption). Physical violence was a daily reality for many birth mothers, with incidents similar to the one Sally describes being a common occurrence: “when I was pregnant with the twins he’d actually thrown me across the room, um, dragged me by the hair basically, I was two months pregnant” (Sally). This was particularly difficult for Sally to accept as whilst their children were later adopted she felt blamed as the mother, and this was reinforced when her partner was able to ‘keep’ younger half siblings with his new partner.

In some cases, mothers blamed themselves for their choice of partner, rather than blame the partner for the abuse and violence they had subjected them to:

“When I was 20 no, hold on 21, 22, silly cow me got married um to a nasty fellow didn’t I, he mentally and sexually abused me for 18 months of our marriage.” (Diane)

Mothers with vulnerabilities, such as mental ill health or learning difficulties, were sometimes with partners who either physically or sexually abused them and their children.

The above accounts speak of the challenges of mothering and raising children, it is difficult work. The already challenging role is made more difficult by financial hardship and poverty, leading to a need to juggle the limited resources at parents’ disposal. The traditional division of labour, which leaves mothers responsible for childcare, also adds to the difficult job and overwhelming responsibility of mothers. Added to this can be experiences of violence, power and control from intimate partners, highlighted above. The discourse of ‘good’ motherhood which influences societal attitudes and the actions of social work professionals can lead mothers to be blamed for failing to protect their children in domestic violent relationships. Poverty and financial dependence influenced whether mothers could make a ‘free’ choice to leave or make any substantial changes.

3.2. Parenting under Scrutiny: Adversity Post Removal

When the above problems existed prior to coming to the attention of children’s services they were often exacerbated once parents became involved in child protection processes and procedures. A number of expectations were placed upon parents, at a time when they were under additional emotional trauma from the removal and loss of their children. Schofield et al. (2011) found that parents own problems were often exacerbated once their children entered care, and that was also the case with the birth parents within our research. For instance, Diane described how the removal of her daughter affected her existing mental health condition, she was admitted to psychiatric hospital shortly after her final contact session with her daughter.

‘Good’ mothers and fathers model good behaviour and socialise children into good citizens. The value placed on what is deemed to be good parenting underpins social policy targeted towards parents. Mothers especially were aware that their actions were judged. Birth parents reported difficulties in balancing competing needs and priorities, as meeting the expectations of the courts in terms of parenting capacity and undertaking assessments could lead to birth parents struggling with poverty and an inability to provide for their child financially:

“It’s not like I can look to go to work yet because of the contact three times a week, I’m at counselling in a, on one day a week, and social services, the assessments etcetera I, I, there just ain’t enough hours in the day like, else I would be at work now, um, just so I could make things financially more stable and better for me.” (Maggie)

Whilst paid work may be the ideal, demonstrating responsibility towards providing for a child, this example speaks to the impossibility of paid work for Maggie when so much time is already committed to maintaining contact with her child, participating in counselling sessions and being available for social service assessments. Paid work also becomes more difficult because of the stigma and social sanction attached to perceived parental failure. Lucy, who has a conviction for child cruelty, is unable to achieve paid work in the area in which she qualified due to the conviction. She focuses on the consequences of the actions of social services and the police:

“I can’t get a job now, all my jobs were vocational, all my qualifications were vocational ones for caring you know, and for child care, elderly, vulnerable people. Now, I’ve always got that question mark against me because of that conviction, which no, and I always say to them did you ever think when you did all this, when you sat there doing all these things, did you ever think of the long term effect? You want me to go out and get a job? How can I go out and get a job? My qualifications are all null and void I have to go back to university or college or do some other kind of qualification and I’m like nearly 40.” (Lucy)

The adversity already experienced was often exacerbated by the expectations attached to parenting at a distance. Colin, a birth father, told of the extraordinary effort he made in order to go to meetings with children’s social services or to have contact with his child:

“I went to every meeting I never missed any, I even walked to them and I walked ten mile to get to a meeting (pause) so, and they can just say, oh well I was half way I was half way across {the town} going to my one of them, and they said ‘oh didn’t you get my message’ I said no how can I you not send me a message or phone call me cos I phoned up to say that I’m on my way, ‘oh it’s been cancelled’.” (Colin)

Financial pressures meant that parents had to make choices and what could be regarded as sacrifices, to do the right thing. Meetings were not always close by and parents were not always informed if appointments were cancelled. The casual tone and late notification of cancellation of the meeting are more hurtful than the distance walked as to parents it signifies a lack of respect by social work professionals for the effort that they are making to stay close to their child.

Expectations and assumptions made relating to attendance at meetings or courses was a feature in the accounts of a number of parents. Nina was 21 when she had her son, she was a care leaver, and recognised that she needed support with parenting skills. She describes how she missed attendance at a parenting course because of the actions of the social worker that she had asked for help:

“I was asking for support from social services, the support I was asking for was to get me on parenting courses while I was in and out there fighting for my son. They got me on the waiting list but because . . . the second social worker that was involved missed the deadline of the waiting list, so I lost out on it. And they kept trying to say “no you was on the parenting course but you couldn’t be bothered to turn up apparently”, “don’t think so” I said, because every time I kept phoning the children’s centre they kept telling me that I wasn’t, my name weren’t even down, and the social worker actually came out and admitted to not putting me on the, er, waiting list.” (Nina)

For Nina this example relayed was about so much more than a missed opportunity to attend a course. She needs to demonstrate that she is 'fighting' for her son and this inaction meant that she 'lost out' on the chance to gain support and make changes that might have kept him in her care. Nina is well aware of how she as a mother will then be perceived by professionals who are making decisions about her abilities. Alongside the timescales of the court process, difficulty in accessing required support and fraught relationships with social workers led to a number of birth parents feeling that they were 'set up to fail' and that an outcome of adoption was inevitable. In another example, Melissa was encouraged to access support but was not able to access it, or certain courses, until her first son was adopted:

"they wanted us to access this support but we weren't able to until he was officially adopted, so I told the judge, and I told [my MP] that how can we rectify what needs to be rectified . . . you know what, if you want us to do something but we can't do it until he's adopted, so we're basically set up to fail as far as I'm concerned." (Melissa)

This seems logical, that support should come before the adoption and that without support the parents will not be able to demonstrate that they are willing to make changes. Melissa tried to contest her son's adoption but was unsuccessful. However, she was pregnant with her second son at the time she contested her first son's adoption, and was successful in keeping her younger son in her care under a Supervision Order. Melissa attributed this to being proactive and accessing a range of support including domestic violence programmes and counselling. However for Melissa the difficulty in accessing this support prior to her first son's adoption meant that she was not able to demonstrate sufficient change to contest the plan for his adoption.

3.3. Adversity Addressed

Despite the difficulties reported by birth parents, a number of birth parents also described how social workers were active in offering a range of support. This illustrates how some birth parents are unable to change sufficiently to care for their children, even when support is offered after children have been removed from their care. Katie told how her social worker offered a range of support services, which she felt unable to accept:

"She said we can get, you need to do a CBT or we'll get you a mother and baby unit but I said no I wanted to stay with her dad cos I couldn't leave [my partner], I wanted to, but I felt like he controlled me." (Katie)

Poor living conditions and financial worries can cause emotional and psychological distress, leaving Katie in a position where she was unable to parent her children even with the offer of support. Shannon, another birth mother, told of the practical support that she had from Children's Social Services in addressing housing debt:

"Because I owed the council money from my property with [my son], um, um, social, social workers kind of got that writ off like, and let me reapply for another council house." (Shannon)

Shannon was placed in a mother and baby foster placement when she had her son, to assess her parenting capacity, as her daughter had been adopted a number of years previously. She had been living in a flat that she described as unsuitable for a baby due to damp, and therefore 'had to give that up'. She was supported by social workers to apply for new housing. However, whilst Shannon described how she was lucky to get a nice house, her choices were constrained and she was forced to accept the house she was offered "because it's on an emergency band it's a case of, well if you refuse like, they'll think, well obviously we'll end up homeless."

A number of birth parents reported difficulties in accessing therapeutic support, for some parents this was due to trauma and therapy being too challenging. For others, there was a lack of available services or differences of professional opinion as to what therapy was required; Maggie relayed how she had to 'fight' to access the therapy she needed, "the previous judge was saying that I needed . . . counselling and attachment . . . therapy and blah blah blah, but my doctor was in disagreement with that, um so, I did have a bit of a battle." However, she was eventually able to access the therapy that she needed. Lucy also relayed how she was able to access therapy during care proceedings, she explained how this had helped her:

"I hated every minute of therapy if I'm honest, every day I hated it. But in hindsight now it's over and done with I, I realise I did get something from it, cos I see how angry my mum and my sister and everyone else still is, and I'm not in that same place."

Lucy became pregnant shortly before the proceedings finished, and she kept that child in her care, which she attributed to the therapy.

In summary, there are a number of ways in which adversity was exacerbated by interaction with children's services for these birth mothers. Some wanted to work but regular appointments or contact arrangements meant that it was not possible, and one parent was affected by a criminal conviction. Others who requested support with their parenting found that it was not forthcoming. The reasons for this were that it did not materialise as promised, or in a timely manner, they were accused of not accepting the support offered or forced to accept inappropriate forms of support. Others did not feel that they could accept the support due to their own emotional state, or the support was being offered in a way that did not make sense—after the adoption of a child rather than before. This raises questions as to what support there actually is for parents struggling with poverty and adversity? Particularly once the court process has started. What are the consequences, real or felt, when support is not accessed or taken up? And where support is offered, are birth parents in the right position to access that support effectively and address concerns with their parenting?

3.4. Parenting after Adoption: Adversity Continued

Adoption is not a one off event that stops at the point of the adoption order, but has a lifelong impact on all members of the adoption triangle. Similar to previous studies, birth parents reported ongoing loss and trauma after the adoption of their child (Clifton 2012; Memarnia et al. 2015).

Likewise, the adversity experienced by birth parents did not stop once their children were adopted. Letterbox contact often served to highlight inequality between adopters and birth parents. Colin described health problems and mental health difficulties, in addition to a history of long term unemployment and living in poverty. He was worried that poverty may impact his daughter's opinion of him if she did have contact in the future:

"It's not a matter of them being well off, right I know that her financial needs isn't going to be a problem, but I know her security's not going to be a problem, I know her education's not going to be a problem, I know she her upbringings going to be pretty, er, I'd say the borderline to upper class, which I don't mind. But she's going to be along the, the, lines of upper class whereas she's going to see her dad on the poverty line which I think would be a drastic shock, and maybe be off putting if she ever wanted to see me." (Colin)

Colin feared that class differences between himself and the adopters would negatively impact on his daughter's opinion of him. However, other parents were grateful that these opportunities were provided and seemed accepting of the class inequalities and their own situations:

"And look at them now, they go to America every year, they're having holidays and they're having a good life, I couldn't give them this. They're safe, and that's all, I want them to be safe and well. [My daughter's] a dancer, she does tap and ballet and she goes to brownies, she's a swimmer, so they look after them. I couldn't've done that." (Katie)

Katie acknowledged that she would not be in a position to provide for her children in the same way that the adopters could. Parents internalise discourses and policy drivers that imply that they are failed, a threat to their children's future development and success in life. This is not perhaps surprising as birth parents whose children have been adopted are criticised, looked down upon and demonised by wider society. The economic and social insecurity which pre-dates their involvement with child protection services leads them to disbelieve that they could provide the necessary support. The narrative presented is that clearly, anyone can see, that their children are better off with their new adoptive families.

3.5. Parenting After Adoption: Adversity Overcome

However, even after having a child adopted a number of birth parents were successful in parenting further children. These birth parents were parenting despite adversity, as often factors, including poverty, had not changed. These parents also faced specific challenges in parenting after adoption. They lived in constant fear that their child may be removed; Shannon spoke of how she was referred to children's services due to her extended family temporarily moving in with her. She therefore had to get her family members to move out or risk losing her son. She described how "it was the worst feeling ever to know that I'd worked so hard and come so far, then they get back involved. I was just like no, I can't lose him." For birth parents who have a child living at home after adoption, that threat of removal is always present. Many parents are understandably afraid to use their voice and question social services. Claire describes this:

"You may not agree with it but you just have to bow down, if you wanna keep your kids, that's what you gotta do." (Claire)

Lisa Morriss recognises this state of being:

'[. . .] women who have had their children removed exist in a state of haunted motherhood, suspended in the shadowlands where the living and the invisible coexist, and temporality is both disrupted and merged . . . their children are there and yet not there; they are living and yet out of reach and invisible. Furthermore, the mothers are silenced by shame and the justifiable fear of future children also being removed through the Family Court system' (Morriss 2018, p. 828)

The above examples demonstrate the ways in which normative discourses of 'good' motherhood impact on the lived maternal experience, whether birth mothers have their children living with them or living separately.

4. Discussion

Adoption from care has not been experienced equally across social class, gender and race divides. The social conditions which foster unsafe environments in increasingly unequal societies (Parton 2014) are not addressed whilst the current focus of policy is on protecting children from their poor parents. The dominant neo-liberal discourse implies that child neglect is a result of parental pathology and individual blame, obscuring structural inequalities and the poverty in which many vulnerable families live (Gupta 2017). Deprivation, poverty and parents' previous trauma are over-looked in favour of explanations which focus on individual deficits. Whilst social workers assessing the welfare of a child clearly need to consider individual concerns, we would argue that structural factors should also be acknowledged. The paper illustrates how birth parents experience a significant amount of adversity prior to their children being removed. Poverty, and associated factors including housing difficulties, lack of basic amenities such as food and electricity, are a daily reality for a number of birth parents. Poverty creates instability and poverty is gendered, women in the UK are slightly more likely to be living in poverty than men, measured on the usual household basis and female headed households are poorer than comparable male-headed households (Department for Work and Pensions 2017). It is also known that mothers go without food or other necessities in order to protect children (ONS 2018). Poverty may exacerbate domestic abuse and violence by increasing or prolonging women's exposure to it and by reducing their ability to flee (Family Welfare Association 2008). Such social stressors play a role in contributing to creating a space where there is potential for neglect, abuse or other forms of maltreatment. This is not to say that poverty is directly correlated to maltreatment or that all parents in poverty will neglect their children (Featherstone et al. 2017, call this a reductive argument).

Timing is crucial in cases of child welfare and protection. There are various ways that time exerts pressure; in terms of the pressure to intervene early to prevent harm, or permanently damaging harm; in terms of pressure to meet system deadlines; in terms of little time to work with families and offer support. As stated above, under the Children and Families Act 2014 a 26 weeks maximum time limit for a case to be concluded was introduced in England and Wales. This limited timeframe impacts on parents who are trying to demonstrate that they have made changes or met conditions set by the Local Authority and may then influence whether their children remain with them, are returned to their care or are permanently removed. Parental rights and needs are seen as less important, unable to be supported, as the 'best interests of the child' are the domain of children's social workers. Parents experience the pressure to change, to engage with social workers and other professionals, to comply with conditions which are set, to show willing, to listen and to follow advice yet the limited time of 26 weeks in which to make any changes, often with limited support, is felt to be almost impossible to overcome. Parents wanted to use the court process to make changes necessary for their children to return to their care, and often used language of 'fighting' and 'battles' to describe this time. However, they also reported that any support they were receiving stopped once their children were removed and the focus moved to assessments of their parenting capacities, or that they were in emotional turmoil and unable to accept support during the court process.

Such tight decision making timescales constrain social workers in their ability to engage with the complexities of family poverty and child protection conference reports miss 'attention to the context of family suffering' (Morris 2018, p. 367). Without accounting for the socio-economic circumstances under which parents are caring for their children it is likely that the parental behaviours become the focus and that parents are regarded as responsible for any shortfall or not meeting expected standards of care. Poverty, in the research of Morris et al. (2018), was not identified or described by social workers as a risk factor for children; instead, parental behaviour was pathologised. The birth parents in this current study also describe poverty and difficulty in providing the basics for their children. This has relevance for all categories of child in need and child protection but it is particularly salient in the case of adoption as parental ties become severed.

Despite adversity some parents can overcome some of the challenges. Parents who continue to parent subsequent children after others were adopted have usually made changes but still face poverty and adversity; in addition, they have a constant fear of their child(ren) being removed, sometimes leading to a fear of accessing support in case this is viewed as a weakness. The shame and stigma of having a child(ren) removed and adopted is felt, lived, and evident in the actions of the parents in this research. As Hyslop and Keddell argue:

'The emotive discourse of risk and abuse, and the associated need to protect vulnerable children, carries immense tautological authority which can serve to camouflage the ideological dimensions of contemporary child protection'. (Hyslop and Keddell 2018, p. 4)

Whilst birth parents' experiences of grief, loss and shame relating to their parenting skills and capacity (or lack of) and losing care of their child have been previously acknowledged (Charlton et al. 1998; Memarnia et al. 2015; Neil et al. 2010; Smeeton and Boxall 2011) the underlying role that poverty and adversity play in such feelings has so far been less of a focus. The influence of social structures in adoption needs further exploration. Gupta (2017) describes poverty in children and families social work as the 'elephant in the room'; it is not openly acknowledged and yet plays a very large contributory factor. That is not to deny that adoption has a role in child welfare. However, we would argue that it must be within a system that acknowledges structural inequality and offers support to birth parents. Whilst there often are negative consequences to socio-economic disadvantage these are not inevitable, support which originates from poverty awareness—practical, material, emotional—can ameliorate some of the more extreme consequences. This paper points to the need for further research into the lived experiences of birth parents.

Author Contributions: Conceptualisation of paper (S.L./G.B.), Methodology (S.L.), Formal analysis (S.L.), Supervision (G.B.), Original draft writing (S.L./G.B.)

Funding: This research received no external funding. The authors wish to acknowledge Coventry University, funders of the PhD study on which this article is based.

Conflicts of Interest: The authors declare no conflicts of interest.

References

- Allred, P. 1996. 'Fit to parent'? Developmental psychology and 'non-traditional' families. In Challenging Women Psychology's Exclusions, Feminist Possibilities. Edited by E. Burmam, P. Allred, C. Bewley, B. Goldberg, R. Ullah and S. Warner. Buckingham: Open University Press.
- Bagnoli, Anna. 2009. Beyond the Standard Interview: The Use of Graphic Elicitation and Arts-Based Methods. Qualitative Research 9: 547–70. [CrossRef]
- Bilson, Andy. 2017. The Government's Adoption Drive Isn't Achieving Its Aims. Community Care. Available online: <http://www.communitycare.co.uk/2017/02/09/the-governments-adoption-drive-isnt-doing-what-it-set-out-to-do/> (accessed on 9 February 2018).
- Brandon, Marian, Peter Sidebotham, Sue Bailey, Pippa Belderson, Carol Hawley, Catherine Ellis, and Matthew Megson. 2012. New Learning from Serious Case Reviews; London: Department for Education.
- Braun, Virginia, and Victoria Clarke. 2013. Successful Qualitative Research: A Practical Guide for Beginners. London: Sage.
- Brown, G., G. Brady, and G. Letherby. 2014. Young mothers in the UK: Push and pull factors relating to choices to stay at home or not in Reid. In Stay at Home Mothers: Dialogues and Debates. Edited by Elizabeth Reid Boyd and Gayle Letherby. Bradford: Demeter Press.
- Bywaters, Paul, Geraldine Brady, Lisa Bunting, Brigid Daniel, Brid Featherstone, Chantel Jones, Kate Morris, Jonathan Scourfield, Tim Sparks, and Calum Webb. 2017. Inequalities in English Child Protection Practice under Austerity: A Universal Challenge? Child and Family Social Work 23: 53–61. [CrossRef]
- Charlton, Lynn, Maureen Crank, Kinni Kansara, and Carolyn Oliver. 1998. Still Screaming: Birth Parents Compulsorily Separated from their Children. Manchester: After Adoption.
- Clandenin, D. Jean, and F. Michael Connelly. 1998. Personal Experience Methods. In Qualitative Research: Collecting and Interpreting Qualitative Materials. Edited by Norman K. Denzin and Y. S. Lincoln. London: Sage, pp. 150–78.
- Clapton, Gary, and John Clifton. 2016. The birth fathers of adopted children: Differences and continuities over a 30 year period. Adoption and Fostering 40: 153–66. [CrossRef]
- Cleaver, Hedy, I. Unell, and Jane Aldgate. 1999. Children's Needs—Parenting Capacity: The Impact of Parental Mental Illness, Problem Alcohol and Drug Use and Domestic Violence on Children's Development. London: Stationery Office.
- Clifton, John. 2012. Birth Fathers and Their Adopted Children: Fighting, Withdrawing or Connecting. Adoption and Fostering 36: 43–56. [CrossRef]
- Department for Education. 2017. Children Looked after in England (Including Adoption), Year Ending 31 March 2017. Available online: <https://www.gov.uk/government/statistics/children-looked-after-in-england-including-adoption-2016-to-2017> (accessed on 28 April 2018).
- Department for Work and Pensions. 2017. Households below Average Income—Percentage of Individuals in Low Income Groups by Various Family and Household Characteristics (AHC), 1994/95-2016/17; London: DWP.
- Dey, Ian. 2005. Adapting Adoption: A Case of Closet Politics? International Journal of Law, Policy and the Family 19: 289–309. [CrossRef]
- DiLapi, Elena Marie. 1989. Lesbian mothers and the motherhood. Hierarchy Journal of Homosexuality 18: 101–21. [CrossRef] [PubMed]
- Dominelli, Lena. 2009. Women's reproductive rights: Issues and dilemmas for practice. In Critical Practice in Social Work, 2nd ed. Edited by Robert Adams, L. Dominelli and M. Payne. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, pp. 66–72.

- Family Welfare Association. 2008. One Parent Families and Gingerbread. The financial impact of domestic violence cited in Women's Budget Group. The Female Face of Poverty; WBG, June. Available online: <http://wbg.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2018/08/FINAL-Female-Face-of-Poverty.pdf> (accessed on 14 November 2018).
- Featherstone, Brid, Kate Morris, and Sue White. 2014. A Marriage Made in Hell: Early Intervention Meets Child Protection. British Journal of Social Work 44: 1735–49. [CrossRef]
- Featherstone, Brid, Kate Morris, Brigid Daniel, Paul Bywaters, Geraldine Brady, Lisa Bunting, Will Mason, and Nughmana Mirza. 2017. Poverty, inequality, child abuse and neglect: Changing the conversation in child protection? Children and Youth Services Review. [CrossRef]
- Featherstone, Brid, Anna Gupta, and Sue Mills. 2018. The Role of the Social Worker in Adoption—Ethics and Human Rights: An Enquiry. Birmingham: British Association of Social Workers.
- Frost, Nollaig, and Amanda Holt. 2014. Mother, Researcher, Feminist, Woman: Reflections On 'maternal Status' as a Researcher Identity. Qualitative Research Journal 14: 90–102. [CrossRef]
- Frost, Nollaig, and Deborah Rodriguez. 2015. "And It Was All My Choice but It Didn't Feel like a Choice": A Re-Examination of Interpretation of Data Using a "Rhetoric of Choice" Lens. Women's Studies International Forum 53: 192–99. [CrossRef]
- Garrett, Paul Michael. 2002. Getting "a Grip": New Labour and the Reform of the Law on Child Adoption. Critical Social Policy 22: 174–202.
- Giele, Janet Z, and Glen H. Elder Jr., eds. 1998. Methods of Life Course Research Qualitative and Quantitative Approaches. London: Sage.
- Gillies, Val. 2006. Marginalised Mothers Exploring Working-Class Experiences of Parenting. London: Routledge.
- Gillies, Val, Rosalind Edwards, and Nicola Horsley. 2017. Challenging the Politics of Early Intervention: Who's 'Saving' Children and Why. Bristol: Policy Press.
- Goodson, Ivor, and P. Sikes. 2001. Life History Research in Educational Settings Learning from Lives. Buckingham: Open University Press.
- Gupta, Anna. 2017. Poverty and child neglect—The elephant in the room? Families, Relationships and Societies 6: 21–36. [CrossRef]
- Gupta, Anna, and Edward Lloyd-Jones. 2016. Re B-S a glass half full?: An explanation of the implications of the Re B-S judgement on practice in the family courts. Child and Family Social Work 21: 539–47. [CrossRef]
- Hays, Sharon. 1996. The Cultural Contradictions of Motherhood. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Hill, Malcom, Lydia Lambert, John Triseliotis, and Maureen Buist. 1992. Making Judgements about Parenting: The Example of Freeing for Adoption. British Journal of Social Work 22: 373–89.
- Hyslop, Ian, and Emily Keddell. 2018. Outing the elephants: Exploring a new paradigm for child protection social work. Social Sciences 7: 105. [CrossRef]
- Kirton, Derek. 2013. "Kinship by Design" in England: Reconfiguring Adoption from Blair to the Coalition. Child and Family Social Work 18: 97–106. [CrossRef]
- Letherby, Gayle. 1994. Mother or not, mother or what? Problems of definition and identity. Women's Studies International Forum 17: 525–32. [CrossRef]
- Letherby, Gayle. 2003. Feminist Research in Theory and Practice. Buckingham: Open University Press.
- Lewis, Jane. 2004. Adoption: The Nature of Policy Shifts in England and Wales, 1972–2002. International Journal of Law, Policy and the Family 18: 235–55. [CrossRef]
- Logan, Janette. 2013. Contemporary Adoptive Kinship: A Contribution to New Kinship Studies. Child and Family Social Work 18: 35–45. [CrossRef]
- Luckock, Barry, and Karen Broadhurst. 2013. Adoption Cases Reviewed: An Indicative Study of Process and Practice; London: Department for Education.
- Memarnia, Nina, Lizette Nolte, Clare Norris, and Alex Harborne. 2015. "It Felt like It Was Night All the Time": Listening to the Experiences of Birth Mothers Whose Children Have Been Taken into Care or Adopted. Adoption & Fostering 39: 303–17.
- Morris, Kate, Sue White, Paula Doherty, and Lisa Warwick. 2015. Out of time: Theorising family in social work practice. Child and Family Social Work 22: 51–60. [CrossRef]
- Morris, Kate, Will Mason, Paul Bywaters, Brid Featherstone, Brigid Daniel, Geraldine Brady, Lisa Bunting, Jade Hooper, Nughmana Mirza, Jonathan Scourfield, and et al. 2018. Social work, poverty and child welfare interventions. Child and Family Social Work 23: 364–72. [CrossRef]

- Morriss, Lisa. 2018. Haunted futures: The stigma of being a mother living apart from her child(ren) as a result of state-ordered court removal. Sociological Review Monographs 66: 816–31. [CrossRef]
- Neal, Anne, and Nina Lopez. 2016. Suffer the Little Children and Their Mothers: A Dossier on the Unjust Separation of Children from Their Mothers. London: Crossroad Books.
- Neil, Elsbeth. 2006. Coming to Terms with the Loss of a Child: The Feelings of Birth Parents and Grandparents about Adoption and Post-Adoption Contact. Adoption Quarterly 10: 1–23. [CrossRef]
- Neil, Elsbeth, Jeanette Cossar, Paula Lorgelly, and Julie Young. 2010. Helping Birth Families: Services, Costs and Outcomes. London: BAAF.
- ONS. 2018. Households Accepted by Local Authorities as Owed a Main Homelessness Duty by Household Type, England, 2006 Q2 to 2017 Q4. Available online: www.http://bit.ly/2rPXFQM (accessed on 10 November 2018).
- Padgett, Deborah K. 2008. Qualitative Methods in Social Work Research, 2nd ed. Sage: London.
- Parton, Nigel. 2011. Child Protection and Safeguarding in England: Changing and Competing Conceptions of Risk and their Implications for Social Work. British Journal of Social Work 41: 854–75. [CrossRef]
- Parton, Nigel. 2014. Social work, child protection and politics: Some critical and constructive reflections. British Journal of Social Work 44: 2024–56. [CrossRef]
- Phoenix, Ann, and Anne Woollett. 1991. Introduction. In Motherhood Meanings, Practices and Ideologies. Edited by Ann Phoenix, Anne Woollett and Eva Lloyd. London: Sage.
- Performance and Innovation Unit. 2000. Prime Minister's Review of Adoption; London: Cabinet Office.
- Plummer, Ken. 2001. Documents of Life 2 an Invitation to Critical Humanism. London: Sage.
- Quinton, D., and J. Selwyn. 2009. Adoption as a Solution to Intractable Parenting Problems: Evidence from Two English Studies. Children and Youth Services Review 31: 1119–26. [CrossRef]
- Re B-S. 2013. (Children) EWCA Civ 1146. England and Wales Court of Appeal (Civil Division) Decisions Case No: B4/2013/1377. Available online: <http://www.bailii.org/ew/cases/EWCA/Civ/2013/1146.html> (accessed on 28 May 2015).
- Re G (A child). 2013. EWCA Civ 965 Case No: B4/2012/3187. Available online: <http://www.bailii.org/ew/cases/EWCA/Civ/2013/965.html> (accessed on 12 November 2018).
- Riessman, Catherine Kohler. 2008. Narrative Methods in the Human Sciences. London: Sage.
- Roberts, Louise, Sarah Meakings, Donald Forrester, Audra Smith, and Katherine Shelton. 2017. Care-Leavers and Their Children Placed for Adoption. Children and Youth Services Review 79: 355–61. [CrossRef]
- Savage, Michael. 2018. 'Revealed: Cash crisis pushing child services to tipping point'. The Guardian. September 1. Available online: <https://www.theguardian.com/society/2018/sep/01/children-social-care-services-councils-austerity> (accessed on 1 September 2018).
- Schofield, Gillian, Bente Moldestad, Ingrid Höjer, Emma Ward, Dag Skilbred, Julie Young, and Toril Havik. 2011. Managing Loss and a Threatened Identity: Experiences of Parents of Children Growing up in Foster Care, the Perspectives of Their Social Workers and Implications for Practice. British Journal of Social Work 41: 74–92. [CrossRef]
- Smeeton, Joe, and Kathy Boxall. 2011. Birth Parents' Perceptions of Professional Practice in Child Care and Adoption Proceedings: Implications for Practice. Child and Family Social Work 16: 444–53. [CrossRef]
- The Adoption and Children Act (2002, c.38). 2002, London: The Stationery Office.
- The Children and Families Act. 2014. London: The Stationery Office. Available online: <https://dera.ioe.ac.uk/19723/> (accessed on 12 November 2018).
- Thomas, Caroline. 2013. Adoption for Looked After Children: Messages from Research. London: BAAF.
- Tierney, William G. 2000. Undaunted Courage: Life History and the Postmodern Challenge. In Handbook of Qualitative Research, 2nd ed. Edited by Norman K. Denzin and Yvonna Sessions Lincoln. London: Sage.
- Warner, Joanne. 2015. The Emotional Politics of Social Work and Child Protection. Bristol: Policy Press.
- Webb, Calum J. R., and Paul Bywaters. 2018. Austerity, rationing and inequity: Trends in children's & young peoples' services expenditure in England between 2010 and 2015. Local Government Studies, 1–25. [CrossRef]

